Advancing Methodologies:

Q & A session with best-selling author John W. Creswell

In November 2017, John W. Creswell facilitated a SAGE talks webinar on the future of research design, qualitative research, and mixed methods research. Below is an excerpt of the “question & answer” session he conducted during this webinar.

Q WHAT DO YOU THINK IS THE BEST TIME IN A SEMESTER FOR A STUDENT TO DO A RESEARCH PROJECT?

I think starting as soon as possible, even right at the first class of the semester, is effective. I like to have students bring a research project of their own, which gets them invested in actively working on something that is meaningful and useful for them.

Q DO YOU HAVE ANY TIPS FOR THOSE TEACHING STUDENTS WHO ARE DOING RESEARCH FOR THE FIRST TIME?

I would suggest to professors that they bring their own research and journal articles—the ones they are passionate about—into their course. What they are excited about tends to rub off on the students. When I was writing 30 Essential Skills for the Qualitative Researcher, I was actively sharing with students some of the chapters that I was writing and how I was using their feedback to improve the chapters. I think it's important to integrate real-life research into what we teach.

Q WHAT ADVICE WOULD YOU HAVE FOR SOMEBODY WHO IS JUST BEGINNING THEIR RESEARCH JOURNEY?

What was helpful for me when I began my journey was that I felt that I needed to become a better writer so that I could tell a better story. I started reading all sorts of books on writing and looked for ways to make things fun and playful. I like to think about how to best engage my audience with fun storytelling so that they may better understand and remember what I want to share with them about my research.

Q HOW DOES TECHNOLOGY HELP TO SHAPE THE FUTURE OF RESEARCH METHODOLOGIES?

Technology today enables us to promote methodologies better than we have ever been able to do before. Take meta-analysis, for example, which began in the 1960's and advanced and developed over the last 50 years. There were only a few key individuals who presented at conferences and had papers. Contrast that with mixed methods in the last 15 years. Mixed methods has had the advantage of Facebook and Twitter, and all of the social media possibilities. Mixed methods as a methodology has been promoted at a level that the early methodologies just didn't see. New technology is going to allow us to continue to develop new methodologies at a much larger scale than ever before.

UNDERSTANDING CASE STUDY RESEARCH: Small-scale Research with MeaningMalcolm Tight, Lancaster University, U.K.

Whether as part of a more substantial study or as the foundation for a self-contained smaller project, case studies provide viable and valuable alternatives to conducting large-scale research. QUANTIFYING THE QUALITATIVE: Information Theory for Comparative Case Analysis

Katya Drozdova, Seattle Pacific University • Kurt Taylor Gaubatz, Old Dominion University

Quantifying the Qualitative presents a systematic approach to comparative case analysis based on insights from information theory. This new method, which requires minimal quantitative skills, helps students, policymakers, professionals, and scholars to learn more from comparative cases. The approach avoids the limitations of traditional statistics in the small-n context and allows analysts to systematically assess and compare the impact of a set of factors on case outcomes with easy-to-use analytics. Rigorous tools reduce bias, improve the knowledge gained from case studies, and provide straightforward metrics for effectively communicating results to a range of readers and leaders.

Ethnography

THINKING ETHNOGRAPHICALLY

Paul Atkinson, Cardiff University, U.K.

Written by a leading authority, Thinking Ethnographically discusses a wide range of analytic ideas that can and should inform ethnographic analysis. In introducing the notion of "granular ethnography" it argues for an approach to qualitative research that is sensitive to the complexities of everyday social life. A much-needed antidote to superficial research and analysis, the text deals not merely with the practical methods of fieldwork, but with the far more ambitious enterprise of turning ethnographic data into productive ideas and concepts. Author Paul Atkinson enables us not merely to do ethnography, but truly to think ethnographically. His book will prove invaluable to students and researchers across the social sciences.

Web Scraping Software

Gabe Ignatow and Rada Mihalcea share insights on the different types of software available

There are several available Internet-based methods for collecting (“scraping”) document collections for social science research. Here we focus only on Web scraping, which involves using commercial software and, as needed, programming languages such as Python to identify and download text from one or more pages or archives within a single website. Web scraping and Web crawling are powerful tools for data acquisition and should ideally be used only within a project with a logical and practical research design.

While researchers with programming backgrounds will generally prefer to use Python or another programming language over commercial Web scraping software, commercial scraping software is reasonably easy to use for non-programmers, and it may at times have technical advantages over Python and other languages used for Web scraping.

Web scraping software is designed to recognize different types of content within a website and to acquire and store only the types of content specified by the user. So, for instance, Web scraping software allows a user to search a newspaper website and save only the names of article authors or to search a real estate website and save only the prices, addresses, or descriptions of listed properties.

The software works by running scripts written by the user. The scripts tell the software on which webpage to start, what kind of text to look for, what to do with the text that is found, where to navigate next once text is saved, and how many times to repeat the script. Saved text data can be downloaded in a convenient file form such as a comma-separated values (CSV) file or a Microsoft Excel spreadsheet.

- Mozenda is a comprehensive cloud-based package of scraping tools designed for business applications (www.mozenda.com).
- RapidMiner is a “data science platform” with Web scraping tools (<https://rapidminer.com>).
- Visual Web Ripper is an affordable, dedicated Web scraping package (www.visualwebripper.com).
- Import.io offers a powerful suite of data extraction tools (<https://www.import.io>).
- BeautifulSoup is a Python library for extracting data out of HTML files (<https://pypi.python.org/pypi/beautifulsoup4>).
- Lynx and wget are online commands available in almost any Unix/Linux environment, which can be used for direct download of webpages.

A Most “Catisfying” Guide to Stats and SPSS

“Many behavioral and social science students (and researchers for that matter) despise statistics.” So says Andy Field, a University of Essex social psychologist, rock drummer, and feline-loving statistics guru, who also happens to be a best-selling statistics textbook author. “Most of us have a non-mathematical background,” notes Field, “which makes understanding complex statistical equations very difficult.”

Luckily, for the students and researchers who need to understand stats well, Field and SAGE have produced a suite of books that combine Field’s irrepressible humor and generous dollops of intrigue, rock and roll, and cats to make learning stats both fun and doable.

The latest iteration in that suite is the fifth edition of Field’s Discovering Statistics Using IBM SPSS Statistics. This edition, fully integrated with SPSS version 25, is a wonderful example of Field’s irreverent approach, which skillfully offers sterling pedagogic value at the same time. “Many of the examples in this book, although inspired by some of the craziness that you find in the real world, are designed to reflect topics that play on the minds of the average student (i.e., sex, drugs, rock and roll, celebrity, people doing crazy stuff),” says Field. “It contains everything I know about statistics (actually, more than I know...).”

The volume starts with the basics of doing research and ramps up to teaching expert-level abilities in multilevel linear modeling. The aim, Field says, “is to make this the only statistics book that you’ll ever need to buy (sort of). It’s a book that I hope will become your friend from your first year at university right through to your professorship.”

For those who have already befriended past editions of the book, the new edition includes a section on how to use the

R plugin to get Bayes models and a new chapter on open science that discusses p-hacking, HARK-ing, researcher degrees of freedom, and pre-registration of research, plus an introduction to Bayesian statistics.

Amid the colorful characters inhabiting the pages (such as Misconceptions Mutt and Correcting Cat), you’ll find numerous step-by-step instructions, frequent tips boxes, self-test questions, real examples from published research, and a guide in every chapter to writing up your analysis. Plus there are links to numerous online resources, such as 132 data files and the keys to SAGE edge digital resources such as video, case studies, datasets, and more.

“This book,” Field promises, “takes you on a journey (I try my best to make it a pleasant one) not just of statistics, but also of the weird and wonderful contents of the world and my brain.”

Do You Have the Skills To Do Data Science?

School of Information Studies professors Jeffrey S. Saltz and Jeffrey M. Stanton highlight some of the key skills data scientists must have Data science is much more than simply analyzing data. There are many people who enjoy analyzing data and who could happily spend all day looking at histograms and averages, but for those who prefer other activities, data science offers a range of roles and requires a range of skills. Let's consider this idea by thinking about some of the data involved in buying a box of cereal.

You prepare for the purchase by writing "fruity cereal" on your grocery list. Already your planned purchase is a piece of data, also called a datum. When you get to the grocery store, you use your datum as a reminder to grab that jumbo box of fruity cereal off the shelf and put it in your cart. At the checkout line, the cashier scans the barcode on your box, and the cash register logs the price. Back in the warehouse, a computer tells the stock manager that it is time to request another order from the distributor, because your purchase was one of the last boxes in the store. You also have a coupon for your big box, and the cashier scans that, giving you a predetermined discount. At the end of the week, a report of all the scanned manufacturer coupons gets uploaded to the cereal company so they can issue a reimbursement to the grocery store for all of the coupon discounts they have handed out to customers. Finally, at the end of the month, a store manager looks at a colorful collection of pie charts showing all the different kinds of cereal that were sold and, on the basis of strong sales of fruity cereals, decides to offer more varieties of these on the store's limited shelf space next month.

So the small piece of information that began as a scribble on your grocery list ended up in many different places, most notably on the desk of a manager as an aid to decision making. All in all, our cereal box and grocery store example helps to highlight where data scientists get involved and the skills they need. Here are some of the skills that the example suggested:

- Learning the application domain: The data scientist must quickly learn how the data will be used in a particular context.
- Communicating with data users: A data scientist must possess strong skills for learning the needs and preferences of users. The ability to translate back and forth between the technical terms of computing and statistics and the vocabulary of the application domain is a critical skill.
- Seeing the big picture of a complex system: After developing an understanding of the application domain, the data scientist must imagine how data will move around among all of the relevant systems and people.
- Knowing how data can be represented: Data scientists must have a clear understanding about how data can be stored and linked, as well as about metadata (data that describe how other data are arranged).
- Data transformation and analysis: When data become available for the use of decision makers, data scientists must know how to transform, summarize, and make inferences from the data. Additionally, being able to communicate the results of analyses to users is a critical skill here.
- Visualization and presentation: Although numbers often have the edge in precision and detail, a good data display (e.g., a bar chart) can often be a more effective means of communicating results to data users.
- Attention to quality: No matter how good a set of data might be, there is no such thing as perfect data. Data scientists must know the limitations of the data they work with, know how to quantify its accuracy, and be able to make suggestions for improving the quality of the data in the future.

- Ethical reasoning: If data are important enough to collect, they are often important enough to affect people's lives. Data scientists must understand important ethical issues such as privacy, and must be able to communicate the limitations of data to try to prevent misuse of data or analytical results.

These skills are just the tip of the iceberg, of course, but notice what a wide range is represented here. While a keen understanding of numbers and mathematics is important, particularly for data analysis, the data scientist also needs to have excellent communication skills, be a great systems thinker, have a good eye for visual displays, and be highly capable of thinking critically about how data will be used to make decisions and affect people's lives. Of course, there are very few people who are good at all of these things, so some of the people interested in data will specialize in one area, while others will become experts in another area. This highlights the importance of teamwork.

New Series Cements SAGE's Key Role in Evaluation Learning

SAGE and the academic field of evaluation have been near synonymous since the birth of both. As SAGE's founder and former recipient of the American Evaluation Association's Special Award for Distinguished Contributions, Sara Miller McCune, says, "We wondered whether the field of evaluation built SAGE, or SAGE built the field of evaluation."

In 2018, SAGE continues the rollout of its Evaluation in Practice Series, featuring short, concise guidebooks. The series emphasizes practice in a specific evaluation method, with a focus on applications and lots of examples for students to explore.

Each guidebook also gives the reader quick but valuable lessons in context, for both the particular volume and, more importantly, the particular method. Specifically, the series editors, Christina A. Christie, a program evaluation specialist and Department of Education Chair at the Graduate School of Education & Information Studies (GSEIS) at University of California, Los Angeles, and Marvin Alkin, an emeritus professor at GSEIS, give an immediate overview of why and where each book fits into the larger series. That's followed up by the author's own introductory note orienting the learner.

"This series serves two very important purposes," explain Christie and Alkin. "First, faculty from across the disciplines use the volumes as supplements in their graduate and advanced undergraduate courses. Second, graduate students, faculty, and practitioners use the volumes as routes into the evaluation literature on theoretical, technical and practice issues."

Two early books in the series, Facilitating Evaluation: Principles in Practice, by Michael Quinn Patton, and Mixed Methods Design in Evaluation by Donna M. Mertens, demonstrate the high bar set by the series. Both authors are evaluation pioneers and former presidents of the American Evaluation Association (AEA) with incredible pedigrees within the association and within the field of evaluation. Additionally, Patton has been recently recognized with the 2017 AEA Research on Evaluation Award.

Additional titles in the pipeline, all by equally impressive authors, include:

- Data Dashboarding for Program and Organizational Improvement by Veronica S. Smith;
- Evaluation Design for Program Improvement by Laura R. Peck;
- Validity and Decision-Making in Program Evaluation by Marc T. Braverman;
- Culturally-Responsive Approaches to Evaluation by Jill Anne Chouinard and Fiona Cram;
- Systems-Oriented Evaluation by Beverly A. Parsons and Katie Winters;
- Enhancing the Evaluability of Programs by Debra J. Rog;
- Practical Valuing by George Julnes and E. Jane Davidson; and
- Collaborative Approaches to Evaluation by J. Bradley Cousins (Editor).

SAGE has become the premiere global publisher of both evaluation and qualitative methods books... fields of inquiry and practice that SAGE helped develop, nurture, and expand worldwide.”

Supporting Data Science on SAGE Research Methods

The SAGE Research Methods (SRM) platform houses a number of resources to train data scientists—from practice datasets for those just learning to apply analytic techniques to books and videos on using big data in research. As data literacy becomes a crucial part of academia, SAGE is committed to providing resources to aid students in data analysis and is looking to increase the amount of content available with planned future collections.

SAGE Research Methods Datasets optimized for student use

Learning to analyze data, big or otherwise, can be challenging for students. It often takes more than just reading a stats book; students need sample data to practice these techniques themselves. SAGE Research Methods Datasets offers accessible slices of data, accompanied by instructional guides, which beginners can use to practice quantitative or qualitative methods research. Additionally, a larger collection of datasets is currently in production for a 2019 launch in order to expand the methods covered and to provide more examples in each. Datasets are ideal to use as course assignments or on exams, as they have already been optimized for student use.

Big data analytics featured on SAGE Research Methods Video

The rising emphasis on big data in the social sciences is reflected in SAGE Research Methods Video content, which features leaders in big data research. Gary King, director of The Institute for Quantitative Social Science at Harvard University, delivers a lecture titled “The Big Deal about Big Data,” in which he shows how big data has drastically expanded the capacity of social science to understand the world around us. Additionally, Luke Sloan of Cardiff University discusses how researchers can use Twitter to understand social phenomena. In particular, he uses Twitter data to try to predict the outcome of the general election in the United Kingdom. As the topic of big data grows in popularity and importance, in 2019 SRM will house a new streaming video collection focused on data science and big data analytics, so stay tuned!

Project planning tools

In addition to book and reference offerings to support data science training such as the Quantitative Applications in the Social Sciences series (Little Green Books on page 56), helpful tools such as Project Planner are also offered through the SRM platform. Project Planner allows beginning researchers to create a road map through an entire research project and offers information on collection and data analysis.
